Pajamas, yes, and night shirts, too, were "the thing" last Tuesday night, May 2, when practically every man in college took part in the annual pajama parade and all night out.

After meeting at Robinson hall about 11 p. m., the "night hawks" first paraded to the home of Dean Robert Williams where the Dean, aroused from his slumbers, managed to say a few words of greeting. Thence, off to howl around the domicile of their "Prexy," John W. Laird, who also sent them on their way with a short, "pajama" address. From President Emeritus Samuel Dickie, who usually "hits the hay" around 8:00 p. m., the men got but a few sleepy words of salutation from his chamber window.

"Just Around the Corner" was seen by the men at the Censor theatre. During the performance they were entertained by the band, who played its own version of different popular songs. A flash light picture was taken before the "owls" left the show.

As a climax to the night's hilarity a huge bonfire was built near the farmers' sheds (with the historical river nearby in which so recently many freshmen and sophomores were wont to take their annual spring baths.)

With all the enmity of the past week forgotten, the collegians joined together in songs and yells, for they were all "jolly good fellows." No, the band did not play "Home Sweet Home," but they went home about 2:30 a. m., a little sleepy but happy with the thought that they could sleep until chapel time the next morning.
